Model, GDP

Abstract: : This study intends to describe the trend and level of welfare disparity among regencies and cities within the province in Indonesia in 2015-2019 by observing aspects of population, population growth, road length, human capital, exports, the number of MSMEs/Small Entrepreneurs and the inflation rate. This research used the convergence method in neoclassical growth models with panel data regression analysis. The results found the gap among regencies and cities in Indonesia were influenced by the number of population, the percentage of population growth in the length of asphalt/Pavel roads, human resources, net exports, the number of MSMEs/small entrepreneurs and inflation with a value of $R = 0.968$. This indicates all the factors studied have a role in influencing the magnitude of the disparity among regencies and cities in Indonesia
